trasted humanity has in a single day been brought together to render an account of itself.

That the work was believed to be practicable, and that it has been accomplished, creates a surprising impression of the perfection of Indian administrative centralization. That it should have been done so well and so smoothly adds, from another point of view, to the perplexity, bordering on despair, at the gulf, wide and deep, between peoples administratively so within control, in every other relation so remote. There are in Asia 252,000,000, all in some respects, and most in every one, politically fellow-citizens of Londoners and Yorkshiremen. How many they are is known, what they do, and where and how they subsist. They pay taxes, they acknowledge the sovereignty of the British Parliament. The obedience of all these millions of hu-The obsdience of all these millions of human creatures to the British Crown is a radiant lewel in it. Indirectly it is a source of wealth to the kingdom, and a brilliant arena of careers. It is not depreciating what India gives and has given to Great Britain to wish it could or would yield something higher and greater. An increase of 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 in ten years is honorable to the efficiency of Pailish rule. Lancashire may take note with pleasure of addition of possible millions to the consumers of its prints. The mere brisiling tables represent a multitude of facts and phenomena abounding in essential interest to the provinces in which the tide of population has been flowing highest. Their importance for uncommercial and unofficial England is hardly emphasized at all by the fact, in appearance so retending that size of $121$. Faultshmen sized at all by the fact, in appearance so astounding, that since 1871 Englishmen have received of new fellow-citizens as many within 350,000 as their own whole number equalled half a century ago. The census of India, with its battalions of gigantic figures, suggests to Englishmen how much those statistics might signify which they fail to signify in the relations subsisting between the populations of the suzerain and its splendid dependency. The British people, as an assemblage of human beings, does not seem to derive its rightful legree of variety and freshness of vitality com the incorporation into it of this too. from the incorporation into it of this tre-mendous total of life.
